

1. Corporate mergers have been accelerated as more and more industries are coming to be dominated by a smaller number of global players. The Reagan Administration staffed the Department of Justice and the Federal Trade Commission with those opposed to strict enforcement of the anti-trust laws. In response, California Attorney General John Van de Kamp and other state's AGs stepped up their enforcement, blocking huge mergers that the Federal government had been willing to permit.

If the Trump administration follows a similarly lenient policy on megamergers, will you stand up and enforce the anti-trust policy that protects consumers, competitors and American workers?

2. Many of the current wave of mergers result in workers losing jobs that are covered by collective bargaining agreement and where worker rights have been respected to union-hostile companies.

Would you take such threats to jobs and workers' rights into account when considering whether to take action against mergers that violate anti-trust laws?
